THE LAW

Beginning on Jan. 1 under Georgia's new immigration enforcement law, state and local government agencies must start requiring people who apply for public benefits to provide at least one "secure and verifiable" document. The intent of the law is to prevent illegal immigrants from getting benefits they are not entitled to receive.

In August, the state Attorney General's office published a two-page list of acceptable identification documents. The list includes but is not limited to:

- U.S. and foreign passports
- U.S. military identification cards
- State-issued driver's licenses and identification cards
- Tribal identification cards
- Federally issued permanent resident cards

Also in August, the state Attorney General's office published a list of what are considered public benefits. The list includes but is not limited to:

- Adult education
- Business certificates, licenses or registration
- Business loans
- Energy assistance
- Gaming licenses
- Professional licenses
- State grants or loans
- State identification cards
- Unemployment insurance
